Abstract: The article discusses philosopher Charles S. Peirce's theory of representation, noting its triadic nature. It is said that his use of the terms representation and sign was similar to that of philosopher John Locke, while the notion of thirdness is said to play a critical role in Peirce's semiotic theory. Also addressed are the term representamen, which refers to that which represents an object to an interpreter, philosopher Charles Morris's notion of a representamen as a sign vehicle, and the relation of interpretation to representation or mediation.
